

Creative Commons Attributions for photographs:

California Poppy: © Jason Pratt / Wikimedia Commons / CC-BY-SA-2.0

Tulip: © Amada44 / Wikimedia Commons / CC-BY-SA-3.0

Primrose: © Phil Sellens / Wikimedia Commons / CC-BY-SA-2.0

Iris: © Derek Ramsey / Wikimedia Commons / CC-BY-SA-4.0

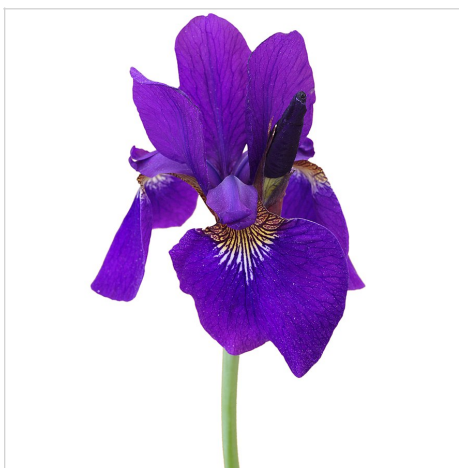

Crocus: © Thesupermat / Wikimedia Commons / CC-BY-SA-3.0

Lilac: © John O'Neill / Wikimedia Commons / CC-BY-SA-3.0

Rose: © Filo gèn' / Wikimedia Commons / CC-BY-SA-4.0

Hyacinth: © Sera.B Amir / Wikimedia Commons / CC-BY-SA-3.0

Pansy: © Osnat Ravid Amir / Wikimedia Commons / CC-BY-SA-4.0

Print and cut out cards.

Glue the cards onto cardstock (white or colored), leaving a little border around each card, and cut them out. This way the cards are mounted onto something sturdier.

You can laminate them if desired.

To introduce the names of the flowers, take one card at a time, lay one card on the table at a time in front of the child, and using clear and enunciated speech say the name of the flower – then ask them to repeat it.

After you've worked on this together, and they've become familiar with the names, you can: lay all the cards out and ask, "show me the tulip" or you pick up one of the cards and ask them, "what is this?". You can also play card to card matching, and flip them all over and play a memory game.

If you have any of the flowers in your garden or neighborhood (or a vase), you can match "card to object" - the card to the real flower.